

Weekly Market Commentary

Investment Team · Week ending August 7, 2026 · Internal

Global equity markets extended their advance this week, supported by a stronger than expected earnings season and continued resilience in consumer spending. Developed markets led, with technology and industrials contributing most of the gain, while emerging markets were broadly flat. Our global equity exposure participated fully in the rally and finished the week well ahead of its benchmark.

Rates were little changed on the week as markets continued to price a patient central bank into year end. Investment grade credit spreads tightened modestly. Fixed income portfolios gave back a small amount of the prior week's gain, in line with duration positioning.

Within alternatives, trend-following strategies added value in energy and currencies, offset partly by softness in relative value. Private markets valuations remain on their normal quarterly reporting cycle, with no interim marks this week. We continue to watch equity market breadth, which has narrowed over the past month, and would view any broadening of participation as a constructive signal.